During the interview will be assessed the knowledge of the English language and other possible languages which candidates declared in the application (specified in Annex B). The committee will also assessed the language knowledge of the sources required for the scientific work, with the discussion of sources relevant to the topics of the project and its critical implications.

During the interview, candidates will discuss the research project and they will be given the opportunity to deepen or further develop it orally (attachments or additional written documentation will not be accepted).

- knowledge of the specific disciplinary reference framework of the project: 0 to 20 points
- argumentative skills and knowledge of the languages of literature: 0 to 15 points

Candidates with a score of at least 40 points will pass the interview.

The Commission will give a judgment of suitability only to those who have expressed their interest in competing for the reserved place, on the basis of the adequacy of the documents submitted. The judgment of suitability for the reserved place does not affect the score assigned to the candidates, but is only useful to assign the reserved place. This place will be assigned, among the candidates who have expressed a priority interest and have been deemed suitable, to the one with the highest marks in the ranking.

Course Description:

The Italian National PhD Program in Religious Studies (DREST) aims to be a center for the instruction and enhancement of specialized knowledge concerning religious experience, its normative and theological expressions, its heritage of sources, and their interpretations. The goal is to create a scientific community that is open and appealing to the finest national and international scholars and candidates who, given the current environment of growing religious illiteracy and a “religious climate change”, are able to produce scientific knowledge concerning diverse beliefs and approaches from the past.

The program operates within six curricular areas:

1. Buddhism and Religions of Asia

The Buddhism and Religions of Asia curriculum includes diachronic and synchronic analysis of the spread of Buddhism in Asia, from India, Sri Lanka, Central Asia, Tibet, China, Japan, Southeast Asia, and, more recently, to the West. Concurrently, this curricular path includes study of other Asian religious systems such as Taoism, Shinto, Bon, Hinduism, and Confucianism in different historical and cultural contexts. Various methodological tools will be used, leading to the preparation of specialists with high historical, philosophical, anthropological, and archaeological-artistic skills in the field of scientific studies of Asian religions.

The various lines of research include the study of the transmission of philosophical texts, the formation of religious schools and heterodoxies, the interaction between religion and society, and the analysis of myths, rituals and symbols in artistic expressions and material culture, both in the past and in the contemporary world.

2. Christianity

Doctoral students who follow this curricular path will investigate the historical events of Christian churches and movements from their origins to contemporary times. They will acquire the philological, linguistic, and theoretical knowledge and skills necessary to research theological, normative, and literary textualities relevant to the understanding of Christianity in its doctrinal, canonical, liturgical, and exegetical dimensions along a historical line. They will develop a critical awareness of the historical differentiation of Christian traditions and processes relating to different contexts. This will build on linguistic competences commensurate with the different subjects and develop perceptions of the long-term dimensions operating in the different historical epochs up to the contemporary one, including comparison with philosophical models and scientific cultures of the different historical seasons of its development on a global scale.

3. Islam

Students who follow this curricular course will pursue the study of Islam, analyzed in its theological, historical-religious and philosophical development. It examines the plurality of forms of its ancient and modern manifestations, regarding the geographical dimension, beginning with linguistic skills appropriate to the different traditions. The educational objective is the study of the theological and juridical hermeneutic tradition, the interaction between religion and culture, the doctrinal analysis of systems of faith and religious experience, the relationship between religion and social and political organization, worship and discipline, and political theology to train doctoral students to develop advanced historical, philological and hermeneutical skills in the field of religion. On the methodological level, the field aims at a robust integration of theoretical-historical reflection, empirical work, fieldwork, and to train doctoral student(s) in the analysis of both written and oral sources. Research and research training is grounded in the need to provide doctoral students with a broad historical knowledge of Islam and the ability to highlight the ties that connect its different forms to the elaboration of political theologies, regulations of public life and cultural representations. This includes "gendered" approaches to reading the Quran, the Prophet's hadiths and religious sources, Sunni and non-Sunni Islam, and the relationship between Islam, material culture and consumption.

4. Judaism

The Judaism curriculum is proposed as a privileged space for research on the sources, materials, and manifestations of the religious experience of lived Judaism. It examines these experiences over time and in all areas where Judaism has spread and manifests, in the East as in the West, before and after the diaspora. Research includes exegetical and hermeneutical studies, the study of cults and traditions, archaeological and epigraphic research, source editing and migration studies, lexicography and the tradition of relationships with other majority faith communities, and the study of persecution and literary memory. With the fundamental linguistic skills needed to examine the work first-hand, students will be able to assess figurative culture in the formation of ritual discipline and worship, with the different cultural physiognomies, both Orthodox and Reformed, and conduct research on areas, texts, and environments of the rich world of living Judaism, up to its newfound expression in the land of Israel.

5. Law and Religion

This curriculum promotes specialized research concerning every possible interaction between legal phenomenon and religious phenomenon in the dual perspective of state/supranational/international law and different denominational systems. Thus, the curriculum includes studies in the areas of freedom of religion or belief, non-discrimination, state/church legal relations, the proper law of faith communities with their own jurisdictions, and all topics in the tradition of ecclesiastical law. Among religious orders, emphasis is given to the organization of the Catholic Church (canon law), analyzed in its historical-institutional development and current positive constructions, and the Byzantine and Protestant canonical tradition, as well as legal systems of Judaic and Islamic origin. Methodologically, the research may also be developed from a historical, comparative and interdisciplinary perspective; students will assess normative, jurisprudential, magisterial and doctrinal sources with originality and mastery. In addition, they will analyze comparatively in light of the most influential factors/processes on legal evolutions affecting religious phenomena: multireligiosity and new religions; disciplining, secularization, reconfessionalization and growing religious demands; securitarian, technological, ecological and sustainable development challenges.

6. Transdisciplinarity, Frontier Research and Technology

The course curriculum intends to promote research concerning the application of the study of religious experience based on approaches that are currently not sufficiently populated to justify the creation of specific fields (e.g., sociology of religion, psychology of religion, philosophy of religion, anthropology, semiotics, history of the arts, and theology) or studies that require technological expertise and scientific qualifications related to the area of AI, Big Data and Cultural Heritage formed in ad hoc pathways of which candidates should demonstrate competence.

Regardless of the chosen field, doctoral students will be asked and offered to deepen and broaden their understanding of sources in classical and/or modern languages relevant to the topics under consideration, to be familiar with the literature of the chosen field, and to demonstrate that they have acquired discernible competences through their dissertations, in terms of originality and quality, including in the international arena.

The following activities will be provided for all PhD candidates:

- a) a common training organised by the Curriculum Council in the form of a summer/winter school;
- b) curricular training planned by the Curriculum Council in the form of advanced workshops held both by lecturers from the partner universities and by highly qualified international lecturers.

The official language of the PhD program is English. However, every student is encouraged to learn the Italian language skills during their study cycle, considering that some activities will also be carried out in Italian.
